

“When you cease to dream you cease to live”

Purely speaking, entrepreneurship means finding a commercially viable solution to a problem people are experiencing but do not realize they have. However, being entrepreneurial is more of a mindset or a way of thinking. To me, it is a path to walk on to give back to society in ways more than one. It is the best way to grow yourself and enable the growth of those around you. To become an entrepreneur, one must build self-discipline and enhance communication and time management skills. It also involves risk management, networking and mastering technical skills. Being a soccer player, I can say it's the ultimate sport, with an additional satisfaction to call something mine. Nothing compares to the feeling of fulfillment and growth that you get when you are an entrepreneur in life.

On the other hand, entrepreneurship can be a struggle for a few people. The strain reaches you several times a day and forces you to step out of your comfort zone, face hardships and do atypical things. It also means being agile and adaptable, working around issues and finding new ways, and adapting to changing circumstances. Nevertheless, the freedom it provides, along with the other positive factors, and the appropriate number of occasions it offers to make the world a better place, outweigh the negative impacts of being an entrepreneur.

John Coughlan, our founder, allows great freedom to all the employees. With freedom comes great responsibility, and in my current capacity as an accounting clerk at TransCold Distribution, I practise this freedom with meeting all deadlines and achieving targets. It also encourages me to think out of the box to deal with the difficult situations. The thought of accomplishing those objectives and eventually managing a team is exhilarating. I am excited to learn new tools and use them to enhance various tasks and processes. I'm motivated to ensure that our products have a unique selling point as opposed to rival businesses. Irrespective of the scale of the product, building relationships with customers is an integral aspect of our business. When I reach my career's pinnacles, I will keep that in mind.

While dealing with legal, financial and day-to-day operations, I have gained experience learning about myself, my industry, and the larger society. Developing a network involves talking to people from all over the world, creating a diverse mindset, understanding multicultural backgrounds and adjusting to a different perspective. It pushes me out of my comfort zone and allows me to grow daily without limitations. I get to create economic and social value by using the opportunity to solve problems by creating employment opportunities, paying taxes and bridging a gap for our products and services. Ultimately, as an entrepreneur, I get to leave something that outlives me and continues to grow and offer value to the world.
